

How can we conceptualize the relationship between the cosmos, the experience of transcendence, and the human individual? Do standard models like monism or theism, and standard alternatives like personalism and impersonalism provide us with an appropriate understanding of this relationship? From a Christian perspective it is already possible to understand the concepts of personality and impersonality as extreme demarcations within an analogical way of thinking. The Semitic, European and Asian traditions provide us with concepts and imaginative models for characterizing religions and their respective concepts of transcendence. Many opposing classifications and many of these systematic concepts (e.g. all-encompassing unity, monism, pan-en-theism, theism) emerged out of a European context from the point of view of the European scientific tradition. The relations between God/divine, world and human are being more differentiated, plural and complex than the statements of the European discourse seem to suggest if they assume simple oppositions of theistic duality and monistic identification or personality and impersonality. Thus, the main question of the conference is how religious transcendence is exposed in different modes, and how this plurality of modes can be compared between different religious systems/galaxies of meaning? Is Hindu thinking about brahman as expressed in monistic traditions necessarily apersonal? In which sense do nirvāṇa or śūnyatā denote an ultimate reality? Which concepts of relationality of transcendence in Indian theistic traditions (Kaśmīr Śaivism and different theistic traditions of Vedānta) are developed?
